A Wow Of A Book!

By SOL HESS

The fat man whom the Tintins met was getting them all soaking wet. "In doing this," said he, "I do not mean to be real mean."

"The water's rather cold, I know, but with its splash the soot will go. Instead of little blackened boys, you soon all will be clean."

Then Scooty said, "I only hope that we can have a piece of soap. My ears are simply full of soot and it's hard to get out."

"A brush would also help a lot to whiten up each blackened spot. We all can scrub each other. That will work out fine, no doubt."

"A good idea," said the man. "I'll get one quickly as I can." He let the hose drop to the ground and shouted, "I'll be back."

When he returned with brush and soap he said, "These things will help, I hope. I see a lot of clean spots now, where once you all were black."

The Tintins rubbed and rubbed and rubbed and then, with more force, scrubbed and scrubbed. At last the fat man cried, "That's fine! The soot has disappeared. The sun that's blazing from the sky will help you get your clothes real dry." And when it does," said Scooty, "I just know we'll all be cheered."

When 'bout two hours had drifted past, the Windy jumped and said, "At last! Our clothes are dry and we're all right." And then they thanked the man.

"You're just as welcome as can be," the man replied. "Now come with me and I will show you just as many nice sights as I can."

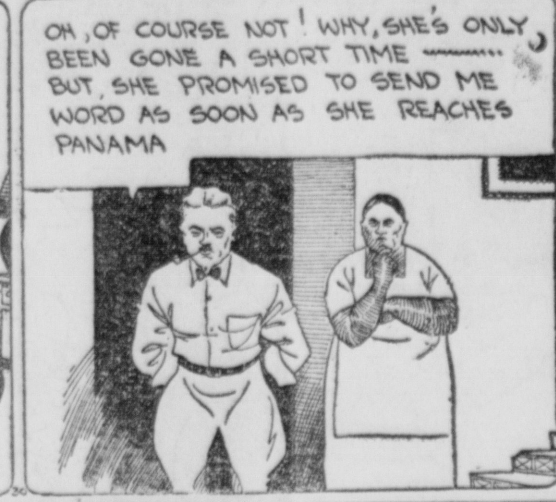

He took them to a little place which brought a smile to each one's face. "I am the balloon man," said their friend, "and here's my factory."

"I make balloons of every sort, and, frankly, lads, it's lots of sport. I'll pay you lads with strange balloons, if you'll start helping me."
